OLAF Round Table on Anti-fraud Communication

How Information and communication can be a means of EU fraud prevention and a true service to the citizens in the respect of their rights?

This Round Table, on Anti-Fraud Communication (How Information and Communication can be a means of EU fraud prevention and a true service for the citizens in the respect of their rights?) is addressed, in particular, to experts of institutional communication (more specifically in anti-fraud, police and other law enforcement matters, etc.), academia (legal, economic, journalistic and communication fields), members of investigative and judicial services (national and international), members of European Institutions, journalists and any other person dealing with specific experience in these such fields.

They are invited to submit to OLAF their own written contributions at the latest on July 15, 2004. A selection of contributions shall be published on the OLAF website and some of these may be published in print format and eventually translated into other languages.

GENERAL RULES

- The content of contributions must not be illegal, harmful or objectionable in any other way.
- Contributions must not contravene intellectual property rights and, in general, the property rights of other people (e.g. patents, trademarks, trade secrets, etc.).
- More generally, contributions must abide by the Charter of Fundamental Rights.
- Contributions must not pursue a commercial goal.
